Abstract

The paper is focused on exploration of social mechanisms of job placement in companies as one of the key elements of social organization of business in Russia. In the first part of the paper the main approaches to the social organization are regarded and the studies of organizational culture are examined. This analysis brings the authors to the conclusion that previous views on social issues in organizations do not capture the essence of the foundations of Russian business development. Thus the authors propose to treat 'social organization' as a system of typical and institutionalized elements of socio-cultural regulation of individuals which consists of mental and practical components. The basis for the main ideas comes from the results of a large scale empirical study in 80 Russian companies. The combination of responses from employees and managers (2382 questionnaires were used) with economic indicators of the companies provided by their top-managers makes it possible to observe major dimensions of social organization of job placement. Firstly, the ways of getting information about free positions are distinguished from factors of getting final job offer. Secondly, factor analysis showed two main factors of job placement. The first one is 'occasional versus non-occasional placement'. But the authors focus on the analysis of the second factor which empirically reveals confrontation between 'meritocratic' (education and qualification) and 'ascriptive-clannish' (protectionism) factors of personnel hiring. Data revealing workers' professional experience, educational characteristics, activities in improvement of professional skills, are consistently presented. The data showed that the average educational level of employees is rather high, but at the same time there is a deficiency of professional education relevant to current position. In addition one third of respondents have work experience in current profession less than 3 years. According to these indicators several 'types of qualification' among workers of Russian business organisations are picked out and described. The most prevailing is the type 'experienced employees but without professional education relevant to current position'. This fact means that the opportunities for using
'meritocratic' criteria of personnel hiring are very limited. This conclusion is combined with two additional points. First, the study of employee role expectations reveals that the value of improving their qualification is rather low. Second, the results concerning training and personnel development in studied companies show that employers rarely involve employees in programs of qualification improvement. All these facts bring to conclusion that the significance of qualification in Russian organizations is rather low. In the last part of the paper several types of protectionism in job placement are marked out, their prevalence is analysed, and social mechanisms of protectionism' reproduction are described. The distribution of protectionism types and their conditions allow making a proposition that the protectionism is deliberately used in Russian business organizations

Аннотация

В статье анализируются социальные механизмы трудоустройства в российских бизнес-организациях как один из ключевых элементов социальной организации российского бизнеса в целом. Авторы концентрируют свое внимание на анализе эмпирически выявленного противостояния «меритократических» (образовательно-квалификационных) и «кланово-аскриптивных» факторов найма работников. Последовательно представлены данные, характеризующие опыт, образование, активность респондентов в сфере повышения квалификации. По сочетанию этих характеристик выделены несколько типов квалификации российских работников. Проанализирована степень распространенности различных видов протекционизма в российских бизнес-организациях, выявлены социальные механизмы его воспроизводства
